Recent guidance on Essential Benefits gave states the ability to allow for flexibility in the designing of a qualified health plan. If the goal is increased access, affordability and choice and the more you standardize, the less choice you have, how much is enough and how much is too much?

- How will states determine how much flexibility to give?
- Discuss actuarial evaluations in qualified health plans: how much wiggle room is there?
- What is the best way for insurers to design a plan that is effective, original, draws participation but falls within medal valuations?
- What critical points and factors need to be determined in plan design to differentiate your product and still fall within the law?
- What considerations need to be made in regards to how an individual exchange archetype will shape your QHP model?

States are moving forward with implementation on varying levels. However, due to uncertainties many remain far behind meeting deadlines for a wholly state run exchange this year. With the recent Supreme Court ruling, how does this play out for states, plans and consumers?
